Margaret Fuller, of Norwich, a Bos ton notice reads: A New Englan Childhood, by Margaret Fuller, is th story of the childhood and youth o Edmund Clarence Stedman, the gifte poet, told by his former secretary, wh pent her own childhead in the same own and who knew intimately those bersons by whom the little Edmund was surrounded. It unfolds with rare delicacy and refinement the story of his early days, and one gots a fasci-nating picture of the lonely, affection-ate lad, precocious and high-spirited, and possessing a lovableness that pen-etrated even the hard mask with which the New Englander of that day jeal-ously guarded his real feelings.

More than that, however, one gets a description of life in a New England village of the period which is val-uable from any point of view, so faithfully and so sympathetically is it depicted. The author is especially happy in possessing a charming litcrary style, and the result may well be called a literary tour de force. Whether the reader's interest lies in the personality of th poet himself, it th New England life of the nineteent century, or in merely reading a loo of superior charm of style, the appear never sags.
